Text: Excerpt from Ani Katz, A Good Man (2020)

The protagonist of the novel is Thomas Martin, who has recently got married to Miriam, a young Jewish woman from Paris.

- 1 Miriam's parents were the first problem. They didn't bother to come to the wedding
- 2 – they saw no point in dragging themselves across the Atlantic for a civil ceremony –
- 3 but Miriam prevailed upon them to visit that December, her first Chanukah [1] away

4 from home.

5 Their taxi pulled up just before sundown. From our front door, we could see their

6 dour faces peering out at the street, as if they were afraid to leave the car. Miriam's

7 mother was a small and elegant woman, her thick dark hair shot through with white;

8 she said very little, communicating through endless touches on her daughter's arms

9 and shoulders. Her father was neatly dressed, reserved and unsmiling. He shook my 10 hand firmly, and I met his eyes for a full three beats before he looked away.

11 I tried to curry favor over dinner as I told them about the house we would buy very

12 soon, my upcoming promotion and raise. They nodded distractedly as Miriam

13 babbled in a torrent of French and English, translating furiously, until her father

14 sighed and held up his hand. [...]

15 When I think of that visit, I mostly think of Miriam's anxious expression, her eyes

16 flitting back and forth between her parents and me, her husband, as she recognized

17 the sundering between her old life and her new one. I felt a palpable sense of relief

18 when these strangers finally went home, leaving my wife and me alone together.

19 Her parents may have been the first imperfection in our fairy tale, but as soon as 20 Miriam got pregnant we relapsed into bliss. I always thought it was a cliché to say

21 that women glow when they're expecting – and I'm sure that for most women, it's 22 not true at all – but Miriam really did glow. [...] It excited me to think that I was 23 responsible for changing her, that I was the one who had altered her body so 24 markedly.
25 I only have one bad memory from those months. It was early summer, her second 26 trimester. We were still living in Brooklyn, and I was coming home from work [...]. I

27 turned our corner and saw her down the block. She was in a cornflower blue 28 maternity dress, facing away from the street, looking into someone else's garden.
29 Miri, my wife. I came up behind her and put my hand on her elbow, and when she 30 turned I saw that she was smoking a cigarette. It trembled in her fingers for a brief 31 moment before I knocked it out of her hand.
32 What are you doing? I said. She took a step back from me.
33 I'm sorry.

34 Are you crazy?

35 I said I'm sorry!

36 I knew we were making a scene, right there on our pleasant street, and the shame of 37 the spectacle inflamed me further.

38 How could you?

39 I needed one, she said. Just one.

40 You needed one?

41 I couldn't help it, I'm just so, so –

42 She couldn't finish her sentence. She began to cry, and after a few moments of

43 watching her thin frame heave with sobs, I folded her into my arms, the gentle mound 44 of our baby pressed against me.
45 It's okay, I said. I forgive you.
46 That was when I decided it was time to get serious about buying a house, as I had 47 promised Miriam's parents. The apartment was barely big enough for the two of us, 48 and it was time to start living like adults. Like a family. House hunting would give us

49 a project, a constructive outlet for Miriam's anxiety, which was beginning to mount.

50 She refused to buy anything for the baby or do more than the bare minimum of 51 research, citing superstitions, the evil eye, other nonsense.

52 A house would be different. A home was something to look forward to.

53 We'd gone to a few open houses out on Long Island earlier that spring, just to get a

54 feel for the market, but now I kicked the search into high gear, broker and all, and we 55 spent the summer scouring the hamlets of the North Shore.

56 Finally, on a warm Sunday in September, we pulled up to 26
Harbor Lane, a Dutch 57 Colonial with a wide porch and dormer windows, half an hour northwest of the house 58 where I'd grown up. Golden light soaked the lush lawn. Looking at the house, I could 59 imagine the sound of footsteps and happy shouts, could see first-day-of-school 60 photos taken on the porch, trick-or-treaters congregating in the doorway, Christmas

61 lights strung up in the towering apple tree in the front yard. I could smell Miriam's 62 cooking in the renovated open kitchen, feel the warmth of fires I'd build in the living 63 room hearth. I could see a life lived – our life.
64 Miriam needed a little more persuasion. She'd gone along gamely with the search, 65 but when it was time to make an offer she balked. She wasn't ready to abandon the 66 idea of a larger place in Brooklyn, even though I'd told her again and again that with 67 our budget those kinds of places didn't exist, and that staying in the city wouldn't 68 make sense for us in the long run. Still, she resisted. It was her trust fund, and the 69 down payment on the house would eat up most of the principal, leaving us house 70 poor aside from my income. But it was what we wanted. She kept asking if we were 71 sure, and I kept reminding her yes, of course we were sure.

72 We closed in early November, a few weeks before Miriam's due date, and after

73 leaving the lawyer's office we stopped by the house that was finally ours, just the two 74 of us. In the front vestibule I popped open a bottle of celebratory champagne, the 75 cork bouncing away from me into the dark and empty living room, ricocheting off the 76 wall.
77 To us, I said, raising my plastic cup.
78 To us, Miriam repeated.
79 She took one sip, then poured the contents of her cup into mine.
